AK-47 was officially accepted by the Soviet Armed Forces in 1949. It was also used by the majority of the member states of the former Warsaw Pact. The AK-47 was also used as a basis for the development of many other types of individual and crew served firearms.

It was one of the first true assault rifles and, due to its durability, low production cost and ease of use, remains the most widely used assault rifle in the world - as much so that more AK type rifles have been produced than all other assault rifles combined.

bullet travels through the barrel a portion of the gases expanding behind it is pushed into the gas tube above the barrel, where it impacts the gas piston. The piston, in turn, is driven backward, pushing the bolt carrier, which causes the bolt to move backward, opening the action, and chambering a new round when the recoil spring returns it back.

see, all it does then, just it every, the operator releases the bolt by pushing it to the rear of the bolt carrier, rotating the bolt to the locking lug (clears the receiver on the underside of the bolt carrier and then pulls it forward and free. When locking, the operator will pay special attention to the barrel, bolt face, and gas piston, then air tightly and reassemble.
